COPS ROUNDUP BANKERS DURING DIAMOND RAID

Pursuit Leads Across Prep
School Field As Law-Chasers
And Check-Passers Come
Together

COPS GET THEIR MEN!

There wasn't much excitement down on the Prep playground Tuesday night when the Princeton Bank & Trust Co. slunggers took on the soft ball experts of the Princeton Police Force, but there was considerable activity. There is a slight difference between "excitement" and "activity," however. Now it is P. B. & T. player had thrown a hit at a cop that would make excitement, but he didn't—fortunately for the player. But there was "activity" when Joe Catlin of the P. B. & T. swung out a base hit for a home run. But in spite of the prowess with the bat, the cops got something on the ball when they made it slip right through the P. B. & T. hands—and sometimes feet.

Traffic Cop Elmer Rodwell, who had a copy in center field, made a sensational play for a fly ball which he didn't want. He had his motor cycle in the back of his mind, and as a feller Elmer is a cracker-jack traffic cop.

Mike Koppelman, twirling for the cops, had a very deceptive ball, in fact, it even fooled Ray Mandone, the catcher. It was so easy that Hank Davis, the speedy, called it a strike whenever he couldn't see it. He was immediately slapped up as a regular umpire at no much per-chance! They would have been playing yet but the game was called because of the 9th inning, even though the P. B. & T. wanted to continue with the Cops 9 runs ahead—some folks are gutters for punishment!

The Cops now have their drag net out to apprehend the First National Bank's fast steppers, and they claim they will be taken into custody before the season ends. It is rumored that they have a suspicion that the First National have been guilty of a lot of base stealing, and they intend to round 'em up by fair means or "foul"—it doesn't matter.

Considerable entertainment is being planned for the boys, including a swim in the ocean.

Nations boast of their graves for the "Unknown Soldier" and we believe we have one here. At least our staff photographer claims he has found one, as the above picture shows. It is a pretty little tribute to sliver an "Unknown Soldier," or something. It is located up at the triangle where Jefferson Road and the State Road meet. The mound is bordered by little whitewashed stones arranged artistically around, and in the center stands a sort of little cross that shows red and sparkling. When it catches the gleam of the auto lights at night. At the foot of the cross grow beautiful flowers, and also several tomatoes. It is well worth seeing. Drive up some night and gaze on this artistic creation of a genius inspired with his art!

Palmer Square Officially Opens Today As Public Inspects Beautiful Tavern

Hostelry Designed for Convenience and Home-Like Comfort—First Dinner This Evening

The official opening of Palmer Square took place today with the opening of the magnificent new Tavern to guests and visitors, with the public cordially invited to come and inspect this last word in up to date hostelry, for the Tavern is one of the most modern, in every way, of any in the country that has been built since the "depression." It is a masterpiece of comfort and convenience, designed by Mr. Thomas Stapleton, the architect who is responsible not only for the planning of the Tavern, but also the entire picture of Palmer Square, all of which is in keeping with Princeton's earlier history and traditions.

Any one who has been away from Princeton the past year will immediately be impressed with the great transformation that has been accomplished. An eyecore of shacks and ramshackle firetrap buildings have disappeared, and in their place has sprung a scene of beauty. And it has all been accomplished in the brief space of one year and two weeks. The vision of Mr. Edgar Palmer has now become a reality in part, for more is yet to come with the completion of the beautiful new theatre now under construction, and a number of other improvements.

This idea of Mr. Palmer's, which critics first called "dream," will be more and more appreciated as it grows upon the public, for like every "new" thing it is sometimes hard to realize at first. The building of this Square means not only additional beauty to Princeton, but it has also meant several things more to the people as a whole during this past year. It has furnished employment to many workers who otherwise would have been idle, and the money in turn has been circulated about the town, for the work has been done by local workmen. In practically one year a block of buildings containing 72 apartments and stores, a Tavern, and a central-heating Power House have already been built and in operation, and a theatre is fast nearing completion. It has furnished employment for various trades and labor, cutting Princeton's relief problem almost down to bottom. Meanwhile there is still plenty of work to be done.

To Mr. Palmer goes the credit for making all this possible, and his "vision" well deserves the appreciation of the entire community for his accomplishments in giving something that otherwise would never have occurred. As for the Tavern which opens today for inspection to the public with a dinner a la carte served this evening from 6 to 8:30, it leaves nothing to be desired in the way of home and club-like atmosphere. It is in keeping with the general scheme of antiquity from the furniture to the interior decorations of the rooms, which were arranged by Mrs. Palmer herself. And with all, popular rates will prevail.

The Tavern is under the management of William H. Lewis, whose genial presence made the old Nassau Inn so popular. For Mr. Lewis knows his public and is expert in catering to their needs. For the past 22 years he conducted the Inn in a manner that brought him countless friends, and patrons of the new Tavern can be assured of the best that perfect management affords. He will be ably assisted by Earl Yeomans, who was also assistant manager at the old Inn. Jack Taylor, another popular figure of the old hostelry, is the Wine Steward and superintendent of the Grill Room. It is a case of old friends in new surroundings.
